The past was once future, but now 'tis past to be present never.

The present is here in all its stern and chilly reality, but the future is yet unfathomed and to us and to all others no difference what may be their station it is the refuge to the later of the late be their station it is the refuge to which our imaginations fly wnen driven from the present by weariness. Our imagination soars upward against the dark and rugged precipice of what may be and then flutters and falls. We all have a future and all try to fathom it but all fail, because by the will of God we are barrely form its sacred trusts. I say all the afuture and none have a more talliant or more hopeful future the the common school boys of our land, and why not Pocahontas boys to as great things and realize as much of the sweets of life as any in our nation.
